LOONA DUSSER

"Le véritable héroïsme, neuvième Golgoth, c'est d'accepter la honte de survivre".
Loona Dusser (she/they, 1999) is a French performer based in The Hague. Loona works predominantly with performance art, metal work,installation, and embodied movement practices. At the center of Loona's practice is bodies and storytelling. Indeed, Loona is deeply interested in how bodies carry memories (personal, collective and political) and reflections of a time they lived and live in. She believes that performance art is a tool to dis-cover those shadows and a practice that can help create with what resists to language. Hyper-sensitive and introverted by nature, Loona usually works from a somatic perception. Their work often begins with somatic reaction to the surrounding environment which are then translated into actions, spatial interventions and materials. Indeed, when Loona creates it often arises from a need for connection, communication with others (performers and audience). Loona is particularly drawn to practices such as miming, clowning, street performance art, embodied practices that involve presence, vulnerability, and connection with others. By working with the body as both material and medium, Loona embraces unexpected information to come shape her process and explores how intimacy and connection can be created in a shared space and a time. Rejecting individualism as an artistic and social model, Loona doesn't believe in individualism and aim, by creating experiences, but also processes to bridge that isolation that the contemporary world puts us in.
